Recently I had a talk with an experienced builder: "Houses in New York city," said he, "are built as budly as ever. The men employed by the building department are underpaid. They should be paid the present salary, plus what they now get from builders to close their eyes to defective work. You see, a speculative builder wants to put up his nouse as cheapily as possible, so he slips five, ton or twenty dullars in the hand of a city inspector. Why, there are today houses upstown that would tumble down if they were built separately. Standing one next to the other is the stile, the sther is the still bury that keeps them up. Epoch.
